The Equifax Personal Finance Blog marks the company's latest Web 2.0 effort to further engage with consumers and transform its website, www.equifax.com, into a trusted consumer resource and destination for topical personal finance information. Equifax also boasts an iPod app, a Facebook Fan Page, and a new Twitter profile (@EquifaxPFB).

"Now, more than ever, consumers are searching for information and answers about their credit and finances," says Trey Loughran, President, Equifax Personal Information Solutions.

"We created the Equifax Personal Finance Blog as a destination for consumers to find sensible, straightforward information and insights to help them make informed decisions about their day-to-day finances."

Every day on the blog, consumers will find new posts and helpful answers on topics like:

- 4 Myths About Your Credit History
- Tax Talk Before Marriage
- To Convert to Roth IRA or Not: That is the Question
- 7 Ways to Save on Auto Insurance
- No More Home Buyer Tax Credits: Is Now a Good Time to Buy a Home?

"Credit touches almost every part of our financial lives and can be confusing, explains award-winning real estate writer and author Ilyce Glink. "The consumer finance experts who write for the Equifax Personal Finance Blog will combine our real-world experience and expertise to create original, easy-to-digest content about the five pillars of personal finance — credit, tax, insurance, investment/retirement, and real estate — that breaks through the misinformation in the market to help consumers make smarter decisions with their money."
