"As we reach the final months of 2024, we remain in a stable, strong financial position in support of our launch into new markets in the near term," stated Richard MacPherson, CEO of Birchtech Corp. "The repayment of our debt to our primary financial partner was a significant achievement during these last few months. Removing all major debt allows for further investment in our company's growth as we work to establish potentially industry disrupting technologies that provide significant benefit to the potable water treatment sector.

"Through our ongoing patent protection efforts, we expect to see additional license agreements from discussions with current defendants that our now underway. Our core business in mercury emissions capture technologies remains a consistent foundation as we continue in our efforts to establish positive business relationships across the power industry.

"Moving into 2025, with this team of industry renown experts and excellent support staff and operational improvements, our future is expected to be punctuated by transitional corporate growth," concluded MacPherson.
