

Unpacking Holiday Gifting: Coresight Research Study Reveals Digital Gift Shopping Challenges and Untapped Opportunities for Retailers and Brands

Seven in ten shoppers expect to purchase at least 40 percent of their gifts online and expect more innovation in the online gift-shopping experience.

STAMFORD, Conn., Nov. 16, 2021 /PRNewswire/ -- A new Coresight Research study on American shopping trends for the holidays, Unpacking Holiday Gifting: Shoppers' Plans and Retail Opportunities, found an increased focus on e-commerce and a longer holiday shopping season for 2021—trends that the research firm expects to continue into 2022 and beyond. The study, sponsored by GiftNow, a Synchrony solution, found that retailers may need to adjust e-commerce strategies to capitalize on these trends, which only accelerated in the wake of COVID-19, or they will risk missing out on holiday gift revenues. Coresight Research recommends that retailers offer early discounts and promotions, improve the online experience, promote demand-directed innovations, and provide a seamless omnichannel experience.

American shopping habits continue to be influenced by COVID-19 this holiday season. Consumers remain cautious about searching for gifts at malls, with Coresight Research data showing that 64 percent of U.S. shoppers have shifted some gift purchases online due to the pandemic. Online channels accounted for 20 percent of holiday sales in 2020, with e-commerce sales surging 32.5 percent year over year, according to Coresight Research analysis of U.S. Census Bureau data.

Retailers should note that shoppers also expect a more connected and seamless digital gifting experience as they take their gift lists online. This trend is significant, as the gift shopping journey is distinct from the one experienced when shopping for oneself. The majority of shoppers believe that digital gifting innovations—such as the ability for the recipient to acknowledge the gift receipt (cited by 76 percent of respondents), input their delivery preferences (74 percent) and even select or customize their gifts before shipping (71 percent)—would improve the overall gifting experience. Moreover, shoppers expect a seamless experience even after placing the order, such as readily available and updated delivery-tracking details.

"COVID-19 has altered shoppers' behavior, preferences, and propensity to spend, and online is the clear destination of choice for gift giving in 2021 and beyond," said Deborah Weinswig, CEO and Founder of Coresight Research. "We expect online sales to comprise around 21 percent of total sales in the fourth quarter of 2021. However, innovation in digital gift cards and personalization and customization options for the recipient are yet to pick up pace and have the potential to enhance the online gift-buying experience substantially."

Americans are shopping earlier and more often this holiday season. Coresight Research's study found that almost 50 percent of shoppers started holiday shopping in October, representing a change from the traditional start of the holiday season: Black Friday and Cyber Monday. Some retailers have started holiday shopping promotions as early as October. Furthermore, nearly 60 percent of holiday shoppers expect to continue shopping until December, demonstrating the opportunity for last-minute gifting and shoppers' increased appetite for deals. Retailers can benefit from early shoppers continuing to make impulse purchases or being attracted by deals throughout the holiday season even after buying their planned gifts.

Physical gift cards top the list of gifts that shoppers would like to receive this holiday season. Additionally, enhancing the digital delivery of gift cards—a perennial favorite gift for the holidays—with digital gift wrapping and personalized videos and messages helps retailers better serve last-minute shoppers. Digital gift cards also provide a possible solution for shipping delays and stock availability issues. This may become even more critical as we move further into the holiday season, given supply chain challenges and the increased frequency of items being out of stock.

"Retailers and consumers alike are realizing that empowering the gift shopper in the gift selection and delivery process can be a critical step in the digital gifting experience," said Pari Raccach, General Manager for GiftNow at Synchrony. "GiftNow enables retailers to better tap into this growing online marketplace, with innovative personalization options that also help retailers stem shipping surcharges and costly returns while making it easier to gift in categories like apparel, footwear and personal care. Enhanced digital gifting is a win-win-win for the gifter, the recipient, and the retailer."

Other findings from the Coresight Research study include the following:

- Demand for gifting will be high. Half of all survey respondents plan to purchase at least nine gifts, and more than seven in ten plan to spend at least $300 on holiday gifts.
- Online gifting is not going away: 90 percent expect to purchase as many or more gifts online in 2022 compared to this year.
- Post-pandemic shopping priorities include value and convenience. Shoppers have a new set of expectations, with shipping costs topping the list of what shoppers consider either more or much more important since COVID-19, along with free or flexible returns policies and the option to track gift shipment and receipt.
