The IdeaFarm provides innovation champions with a wide array of tools to encourage creativity:

- Cutting-edge technology, such as digital/touch-screen white boards, wireless audio, and wireless projection.
- Software to facilitate mind mapping, card sorting, and prototyping.

 Manual tools to stimulate the brain, including Play-Doh, Legos, Yo-Yos, playbooks, and Rubik's cubes.

Contemporary furniture on wheels replaces traditional seated conference tables, contrasting the original farmhouse architecture and allowing innovators to adapt the environment to their collaborative needs. The space also features a wooden swing, a bench crafted from the front end of a London taxi, and glass doors that double as writable surfaces for brainstorming. The original hardwood floors have been repurposed as shelving throughout the space, and compromised support beams have been replaced with ones from historic barns.

SEI employees will be certified by third-party professionals to facilitate creative sessions at the IdeaFarm. These trained facilitators will help direct effective engagement, collaboration, and discovery through various strategies and processes, including storyboarding and journey mapping.

"The IdeaFarm strengthens our innovative culture, which is the very foundation of our company," said Russ Kliman, Head of Strategic Programs and Innovation for SEI. "This space empowers forward thinking to explore next steps in business evolution, as well as grow ideas that enable our clients to take full advantage of our products and services."

Built around 1740 and situated near the defunct Perkiomen Railroad, the farmhouse walls literally hold hundreds of years of history. While transforming the weary farmhouse into the IdeaFarm, contractors tearing down drywall uncovered a revised second-edition spelling book, which was inscribed with the year 1799 and the name Thomas Wade (born in 1776 and died in 1870). Caleb Cresson purchased the home in 1862, shortly before Wade died. Cresson was related to the Wetherills, an affluent and legendary family in the Oaks area. The farmhouse's continued sense of purpose provides opportunities for past reflection and future inspiration.
